CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSIONS AND SUGGESTIONS

4.1 Conclusions

To be concluded, a process of communication can't be separated from language. The role of language is very significant since a good language can facilitate process of transferring information from the provider to the receiver. Hence, the provider should seriously pay attention to the using of language in the process of providing information, in particular the grammatical structure.

As the writer has explained in the discussion of background before that a good language can't independently run without a good arrangement of the structure of language, we can't ignore it anymore since its role is very significant to the process of providing information.

However, when we are faced with the process of translation, the arrangement of the structure of language will be more difficult since the process involves two languages mostly having different grammatical structure. That was what the writer had faced during the job training. However, finally, he found an appropriate approach to cope with the problem that was the theory of translation based on Larson's approach about an idiomatic translation then he had successfully translated the website documents of UNIKOM.

4.2 Suggestions

Based on the previous discussion, there are some suggestions that are defined as follows:

a. The provider of information should seriously pay attention to the using of language in the process of providing information.
b. The provider of information should also seriously pay attention to the principles of communication.
c. The provider of information should also pay attention to the quality of the information through the quality of the language used.
