CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSIONS AND SUGGESTIONS

4.1 Conclusions

From the discussion in the chapter three, the present writer gives a conclusion that: when there is a conversation between two persons and the one of person does not know what the other person means, it will make him shamed. To save his face, indirect speech acts, conducting indirect relationship between structure and function, is performed. This action will follow a certain illocution, for example persuading.

Concerning to the analysis of data, the illocution of indirect speech acts performed, are: (1) convincing others that the drawing illustrates a horse, and (2) getting the other participant, Rere, realize that the action is disturbing and, of course, move from in front of the tv. Otherwise, the aims of the actions are conducting politeness and minimalizing the conflict.

4.2 Suggestions

From this research, the present writer knows that this research is still too far from completeness. The present writer expects the readers for the next research may discuss about locutionary or perlocutionary on how the type of relationship may potentially effect on the perlocutionary. Therefore, it can help people who need the information about those types.
